Limited Strategy

It may be a hangever from the war, whan police reporters became military analysts and weary old desk meniomerged as strategic experts but there seems to be a distression tendency of the part of the mo indication that the CIOs and the AFIs have joined hands, or are even on speaking terms. And within the ranks of individual unions there are signs of dissent. Locals keep jumping the min and ignoring orders from the high com-mand to get back in line and want for

mand to get back in line and wait for the bugle.

It doesn't make Secretary Schweilers-hach's problem any simpler. It would be fine if he could sit down with some sort of labor general staff and work out terms. Instead, he has to deal with accres of individual labor leaders aimi-ing for a variety of goals. Most of them. it is true, are interested primarily in. more money, or at least in the continua-tion of the high wages brought on by the war. But beyond that there are doesn of considerations, all of great importance to union professionals.

Voices Of The Past

Th effectiveness of the Full Employment Bill, as planned by the Administration, was not destroyed by the dead forces of reaction. It was not the scheming Old Guard, glaring dully out at a new world, that pulled its tech. The job was done by men who simply do not believe that we can make our way to prosperity by bilthuly spending to an ever-larger deficit. These enemies of the plan were not victous old-timers sourced by ancient and outmoded ideologies. They just didn't believe $25 a week for millions of workers in transition would ease the way linto peacetime prosperity. But there were certain enemies of the bill who did sound like voices out of the dead past. Some of their utterances have

The new tenant is a professed common man, a poet-lournal-six-historian who has devoted most of his life to establishing the greatness of Abraham Lincoln. The departed owner was a Charleston artisocrat, a Confederate soldier who applied the word common only to inferior grades of cotton and citzenity. When Carl Sandburg was growing up in Galesburg. Illinois, absorbing the Lincoln legend and latenting with his poet's ear to the sound of America, Captains Smythe was adding up the colimans of figures that told the story of a new industry building on the wreek-age of reconstruction. He founded cotton mills, then banks, and if he didniversal in the card out a barrons. Both men were creators: Smythemade money, Sandburg made music. The void between their careers was immeasurable. measurable. The Capitain became president of the American Cotton Manufacturers Association at about the time Sandburg was breaking the bounds of journalistic prose and bringing out a volume of verse decrying the Chicago race riots.

Sandburg is coming to Connemara. the old Smythe estate at Flat Rock to rest, pluch his guitar, and sing folk ballads. He hasn't said so, but apparently he believes his creative days are over. He should be warned that it didn't work out that way for his predecessor. The Capitain turned over the bulk of his holdings to his heirs when he came to Connemara, but he kept for himself the little Balfour mill at Hendersonville. And every day, almost to the day he died, he rode down to the office and pulled up to his roll-top dess. Thus the magnifices Balfouris chief legacy-may not yet be complete. There may be more to come, wrung out of the old post-by the restless ghost of the old confederate.

Unreconstructed

One of the stoutest disciples of free private enterprise of our acquaintance is a young lady of three who staged a robust rebellion against Congressional authority over the week-end. The Washauthority over the week-end, The Washington ediet shifting our lives from war time to standard time meant less than nothing to her. Her calm defiance of Pederal subtonity, we suppose, was repeated all over the country Sunday and Monday, and if all moppels were as successful as she, we've days of misery ahead of us.

Saturday evening, for example, she suddenly and perversely reversed her usual policy of deadling about before bedtime. She demanded to be put, to bed at 7,30 sharp, and she'd have none of the vague explanation that time was to be set back an hour overnight. And on Sunday morning of course, she was to be set back an hour overnight. And to be set back an hour overnight. And on Sunday morning of course, she was up and about at six o'clock, her digestive system still on the old schedule. She saw through every parental attempt to postpone her breakfast, her Sunday School trip, her lunch, her nap—and her

School trip, her janen, her nap-and ner bedtime.
When it was explained thatghis new system would benefit the farmers, she wanted to know if she was a farmer, and maintained persistently throughout that when dark came it was bedtime.
