The Moon And Mr. Dulles: A Dim View

John Foster Dulles has taken an a world bemused by satellites and instance which is not allogether surressing it is Mr. Dulles' dreary fate to find dim views wherever he travels on this fremed sphere and he sees no trason to believe things will be better on the moon.

The Russians will be there first, won't they, resping whatever propagands and who wants it, what cless is to be gained. The answer seems to be that the Russians certainly will be there first if Mr. Dulles' view nevalls. As to propagand, and who wants it, what cless its to be gained. The answer seems to be that the Russians certainly will be there first if Mr. Dulles' view nevalls. As to propagand, benefit the West wants it if—or should. Mr. Dulles view nevalls. As to propagand a summat nevelup he doesn't want. His distants for the art of propagand a summat nevelup he doesn't want. His distants for the art of propagand is one of the most puzzling aspects of Mr. Dulles' personality.

This is no to say that his desire to tidy up earth before tacking the universe is unreasonable. It is not, but his view does seem to lack a market. The Elisenhower administration is surely thought it was reasonable not to enage in a race with Russia to get the first satellite up. The unfortunate consequences are easily recalled.

In the circumstances, the Dulles theory on outer space exploration, and the respect of Mr. Any more space exploration. Any more space on a propaganda, to be sure, no one knows what can be gained from outer space exploration. Any more space no may exploration is a gemble. There are no guaranteed rewards. The only justification of exploration—and it is justification enough—is to find the answers to questions raised by the questing mind of man.

The Russians were not the first to raise these questions, and efforts to answer them should not be considered as despotic exhibitionism. That the Russian efforts may be as Dulles contends, but even this, is a point he cannot sell.

Napoleon was at least comprehensible. Today's assorted terrors are utterly incomprehensible to most Americans—radioactive fallout, intercontinental ballistic missiles monsters from our own planet, blings that got bump in the night and a recession in which the cost of living keeps zooming unexplainably toward Mars.

The bogers would not be so bad if they were not met by almost universal pessimism and despair We have simply come to think of mankind as no more significant that. Pavlov's famous dog—reacting on schedule to certain stimuli. It is about time that somebody decided that men are thinking and feeling creatures quite capable of making moral decisions. Whatever the source of man's anxiety it is remediable. The mind that can send rockets to the moon can send its terror to the trash heap with last month's magazines. We are more than a little weary of the soothswares of sorrow who commain about the "unjust and unmagniable" condition of man. A resolt is in order—an old-fashioned revolt by the individual against the unimaginable.
