Cost of State Education Rises in Dormitory Rent

By LYNN NISBET
News Raleigh Bureau

RALEIGH—Several entirely unconnected, but definitely related, items about the increasing cost of education have come to your reporter's desk in the past few days.

There was a personal letter from a former N. Eastern North Carolina student protesting the increase in state tuition at state colleges put in effect last year, and the recent increase of $35, or 20 percent, in dormitory rentals at the university. He plaintively and properly asks why education should be so expensive in North Carolina.

The State Board of Higher Education took cognizance of the rising costs, and noted that the cost of a modern dormitory room is about $2,000, while quarters for married students run to around $10,000 per family unit.

Then there was a general news story about findings of one of the several Rockefeller foundations to the effect that "the nation's need for good education is immediate, and good education is expensive."

Implicit and inherent in all these items is the main question of who should pay the admitted high cost of providing education for boys and girls, young men and young women. Everybody conceded the need for better educational facilities, and everybody admits the cost is high and growing higher every year.

There is wide divergence of opinion as to who should pay the bill. That question arises in the elementary and secondary schools, but is more provocative in the field of higher education. It seems to be most acute in technical training just above high school and in university graduate levels.

Protagonists for every position have frequent recourse to the constitution to support their contentions, and often without much real help. The things that run up the cost of education, from first grade through the university graduate school, are not contemplated in the constitution.

The constitution requires a six-month school term and empowers the General Assembly to require attendance of every child for a minimum of sixteen months between the ages of six and eighteen. The General Assembly set an eight-month term, with compulsory attendance for the full term. The constitution says nothing about bus transportation or lunch rooms. It does require free tuition, but not free textbooks.

The constitution further provides that the benefits of the University shall "as far as practicable, be extended to the youth of the State free of expense for tuition." The degree of practicality for free tuition is left to the General Assembly—and there is nothing in the constitution about dormitories.

or dining rooms or athletic fields. There is no requirement in the constitution for, and just as certainly no law against, the statutory establishment of numerous other colleges and institutions between the public school system and the university. These additional institutions as well as all the auxiliary facilities were conceived to be necessary, or at least highly valuable, by the General Assembly from time to time. But there can be no doubt that the auxiliaries have tremendously increased the total cost of the educational program. There are some people naive enough to think that those who directly benefit from these services should pay the major part of their cost. To many other people that idea is reasonable.

The state spends some $1 million a year of tax money collected from all the people to transport about half the public families, who study in the schools. The other half, whose families pay just as much for this service, do not benefit from it. There is growing belief that users of the school buses ought to pay for their operations.

There is a growing belief that college and university students for special laboratories, but it is common practice to add a separate extra fee for charged users of the school buses ought to pay for their operations.

Good education is expensive. But even casual analysis of the total cost will show that an individual part of it goes for textbooks and frills and trifles, comforts and delicacies, which have come to be accepted as inevitable, but which in fact are not essential requisites of a basic educational system.

Four important economic factors indicate the country's business slowdown will not continue past mid-year (1) consumer buying power is high; (2) retail sales continue strong; (3) inventories have been trimmed and stocks will soon have to be replenished; and (4) government spending, including defense spending, is proceeding at a faster rate than anticipated.

At the beginning of 1957, the U. S. Social Security reserve fund had $22.4 billion, and only dropped to $22.4 billion by the end of the year, a drop of less than half of 1 percent. A larger number of claims were made than anticipated due to more than 60,000 working women and wives retiring early at age 62 on reduced benefits.
