instigated with a new species of spies. A careless word, spoken to a supposed friend, might be widely distorted and reported to the GPU—with a sudden call to Moscow by the news. The GPU, held by the necks the Communist leaders everywhere, and it was better off in the line of fire, as it needed to be drawing the noose around them.

At the end of June, in a conference with Wolweber, Jensen and Avatin, I requested point-blank what the Communist organization operating in Germany should undertake to smuggle Fritzel and our son out of the country. "It is a small thing to you," I intimated. "It can be done by three or four determined contacts. And to me, this is a big thing."

Almost at once Michel Avatin replied his readiness for action. To him, every act against the GPU was a feat. Jensen hesitated, but Avatin's conviction was irresistible. Avatin rejected my plea.

"We cannot afford to risk the liquidation of an excellent agent," he said. "To the contrary. Our contacts must be built up. In the near future we shall through you suggest to the Gestapo a number of reliable contacts as prospective agents for the Gestapo. The disappearance of Fritzel would wreck our chances of planting our operators in the country, and that is not our top command, then you are no Bolshevik!"

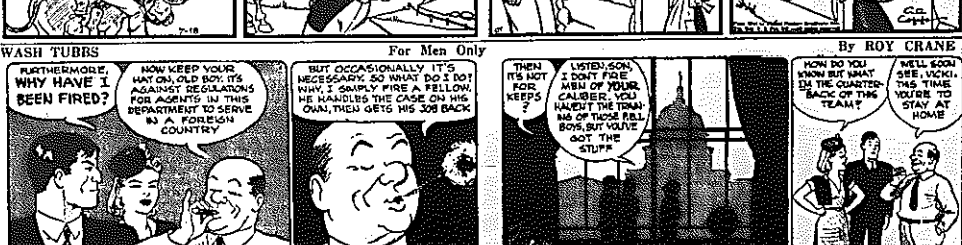

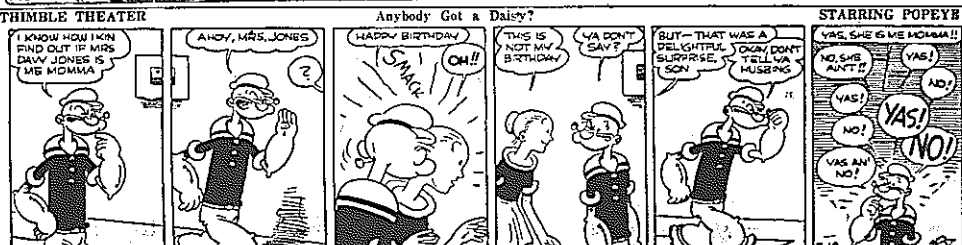

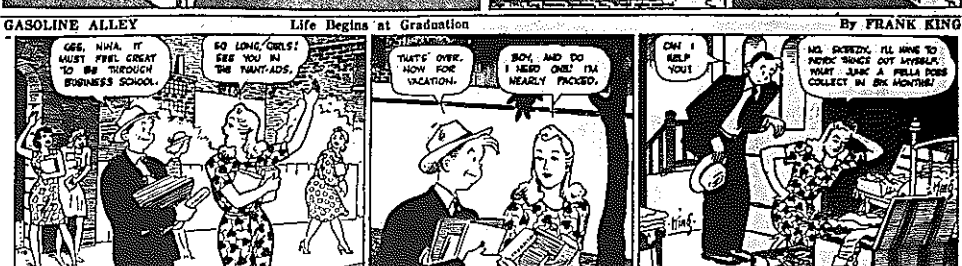

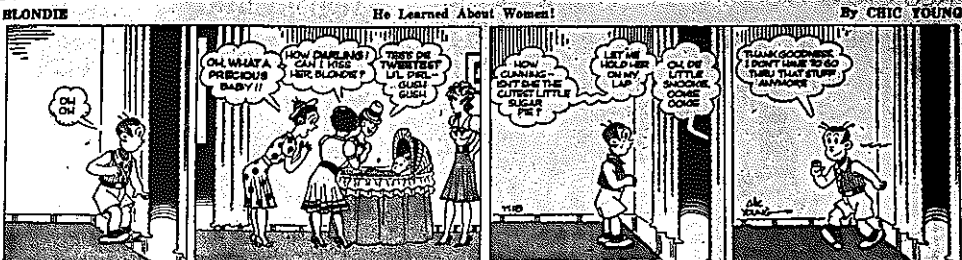

A telegram from Inspector Kraus called me back to Hamburg. A mysterious Russian who gave his name as Popoff had been arrested aboard a train from a Gestapo photograph, I recognized in him a GPU contact. If the Gestapo knew as Schmidt.

I learned that Schmidt-Popoff had been arrested since I did not trust his own eyes. We drove through Copenhagen to the suburb of Gentofte. The car turned into Ordrupvej and passed the garden stretching across a colony of modern apartment houses.

"I am bringing you to Petra Kraus's place," I followed in his tracks. He walked to a quiet well-guarded entrance. The car sprang forward. A tremendous grin spread over Schmidt's face. "Damn it, you made it!" he gasped repeatedly. "If I did not trust his own eyes."
