New Deal Died With Roosevelt. Writers Believe

By BUREE DAVIS

Associate Editor, The News

WASHINGTON — Three veteran Washington correspondents, at least, believe that the New Deal died with Franklin Roosevelt. They didn't say so in as many words, but the testimony of Drew Pearson, Marquis Childs and Constantine Brown definitely gave me that impreasion.

These three veterans, representing three sharply different points of view, largely agree as to what lies ahead for the country under the leadership of Harry Truman. All believe that he is a man of afternght, that he is a simple, sensible man who will move slowly but surely. They do not agree as to bis political future, however.

"Mr. Roosevelt, so far as posterity is concerned, died at a fortunate time. We are winding the war, things are going well, be had to face no unemployment problem such as it coming, and he passed when his legislation was beginning to lose out in Congress—like the the view of Lend-Leace."

Congress—like the the vote on Lend-Lease."

Brown is campaigning for ex-Senator Guy Gillette as Secretary of State, but hant much hope. When he wrote a story suggesting Byrms for 16 Job last Sunday, the Washington Fost rehased to publish it.

Brown of Marquis Childa was similar, but different in important details:

The unity we have now came in the wake of Mr. Rooseveltz death. It's surely a honeymoon, and that can't last. Someone will throw the first stone soon. Truman can be tough and determined, as on the Truman Committee, when he didn't hesitate to challenge Roosevelt policies.
