A Noble Work In The Shrine Bowl

THE happy way in which Americans do good works is exemplified in notable fashion today in the Shrine Bowl game, which has its eleventh annual performance in Charlotte. Benefit games now are an old institution in this country but the Carlolina All-Star classic sponsored by the Shriners is unique among American high school sports spectacles which serve a noble cause. The benefits from it are so widespread that figures on attendance and funds raised for charitable purposes tell only a part of the story.

Henry Wallace Flies Blind

I INDER the suspices of the Southern Conference for Ruman Welfare, Henry Wallace recently invaded the South again. As is the case in all of Henry's considering the processors of the complete free control on the complete free control of the control of Arnali.

Once Henry returned to the safety of his editorial sanctum in the offices of The New Republic, he dipped his pen into his ample supply of vitriol, and painted another black picture of the state of the South. His current article is entitled, "The Dark South; Faint Stirrings of Progressivem".

Evidently the sort of stirrings Henry was seeking are raint indeed, for after an opening sentence to the effect that "a new spirit is stirring" he slips back into his familiar rut in paragraph three by slamming "the alliance of textile mills and big utility with the stirring of the stirring and big utility.

The unfortunate aspect of the Wallace article is the insistence that racial secregation is the root of the Southern problem, hence the refusal to concede (that any properties is possible without destruction of racial barriers. Henry is only one of the myriad reformers captivated with the illusion that immediate abolition of segregation will make the South a land of milk and honey.

make the South a land of milk and honey.

As long as Henry Wallace continues to blind himself to the resilities of the Southern complex, and to discount as futile any rate of progress alower than that which be advocates, it is not likely that continued the south of the south state of the section of the south state of the section of the south state of the section of the south is marchine forward in its own way. This self-imposed myopia serves only to impurp his motives: his relentess criticisms do not, in any sense, delay the sure progress being achieved by men more sincere and less noisy than he.

Hidden Dynamite For Charlotte

POLICE are uncertain whether there was dynamite in the explosion which wrecked the Rendervous Sandwich Shop at 317 S. Church St. and killed Oliver P. Rerry, a former illicit liquor dealer. It is clear, however, that there is hidden dynamite for Charlotte in this case.

The investigation apparently has estab-lished that the blast which killed one, in-jured two and jarred fourteen other sons in the Rendevous was no accident. Accident or not, the incident has brought to light evidence that Charlotte has a racket industry which is a challenge to the whole community.

When one line of lilicit traffic is closed to the underword operators, they look for other fields to exploit. The depression in bottlegging, resulting from the introduction of the ABC system here, has been been contained to the crooks to the crooks to Reviral of the 'numbers and the crooks to the review of the crooks to the crooks t

The experience after the First World War and during the prohibition period, when the crime wave in America reached un-precedented heights, has a meaning for this time. We are again in the midst of an unsettled period, a time of easy money and moral lastivy. In the blast on Church Street his week, police and other law enforcement authorised to the conditions which produce major crime exist in Charlotte. While police are trying to solve this baffling case, it is time for all enforcement agencies to double-check their departments and to call for fresh reports on conditions which are likely to encourage lawbreaking. It is time for heads of the various agencies to confer with one another for co-ordination of law enforcement efforts. It is time for our Government representatives to show a greater interest in the work of the agencies, and for all other conditions of the control of their Government.
