POLITICAL PATRONAGE

POLITICAL PATRONAGE

POLITICAL patronage is somewhat like dirty lines; you just don't bring it out in the open.
Everybody knows about it, of course, and they accept it as one of the inevitable consequences of the two-party system of American politics. But they are not accustomed to such a raw display as that coming out of Washington this week.
Democratile Party Chairman Howard McGrath left a White House conference to announce to newsmen that a new 'party loyaliy' test had been worked out to determine what voice Democratic Senators. and Representatives would have in selection of the sele

Mr. Truman, the next day, made it plain that votes on repeal of the Taft-

Hartley Act and other Democratic party, platform pledges would be the real test, Congressmen who buck the party's program, he said, will not have anything to say about who gets Federal jobs.

The concern of the President, and Mr.

say about who gets Federal Jobs.

The concern of the President, and Mr.

McGrath, over the rebellion and dissenston among Democratic ranks is, of course, understandable. Mr. Truman considers he got a mandate from the voters, and fears that failure to get he shall be party in next years Congressional elections.

As head of the winning party, he is within his rights in trying to restore order in the party ranks.

But he could be a little less raw and a little less blunt about it. There are still some Americans who are naive enough to believe that Federal, appointees ought at least to be reasonably competent people, not selected solely on the basis of political expediency. This diaplay might turn them into cynics, like the rest of us.

But that fact in itself emphasizes the abiding faith of Elliott White Springs and his associates in the textile industry and in Here is a firm which looks farther ahead than the backlog of orders on hand to get set for the long pull. It's the sort of for-sight which makes for permanence of the South's progress towards a better balance between agriculture and industry.
