Do the Councilmus believe in urban redevelopment as and do they were act Charlotte to clear away its almus like cities in some 35 other states are doing?

A constitutional case in limit severely the areas to be redeveloped.

But that handlesp is not insurmountable. The Charlotte Commission believes it can still carry out feasible redevelopment projects elsewhere will do. And it has suggested to the Council (quite wisely we believe, that the first step should be to test the constitutionally of the enabling act as it now stands.

A constitutional test will have to come at one stage or another, and it might as well be gotten out of the way now.

Yet there is no point in spending more Federal money carrying a test case to the Supreme Court unless the present (ity Council believes that urban redevelopment is a good thing, worthwhile from the standpoint of erasing slum areas and replacing them with useful, productive, and targeroducing new property.

The previous Council put a high value on the simple of the council does not agree with this step, or with the urban redevelopment is rights and the cities and the council does not agree with this step, or with the urban redevelopme er count on the ways and the state of the program they were asked to administer.

If the Council is not sold on urban redevelopment, it will hardly stand fixed later on when the hard-handed owners of slum properly descend upon the public hearings to denounce as "socialistic" this laudable effort to clear away, for all time, the crima and diseases breeding sinuss that peculiarly the face of the otherwise lovely many that the face of the otherwise lovely many that the face of the otherwise lovely many that the face of the otherwise lovely one country. They have merely recommended to the Council that a test case of the constitutionality, at no cost to the city, should be carried out before any further plans are made. If the Council does not agree with the step, or with the urban redevelopment program, it is entirely within its rights and responsibilities to call a halt now, permit the Commissioners to shed themselves of a difficult assignment and return to their personal and private enterprises.

NO BRICKER AMENDMENT THIS YEAR

SEN. BRICKER of Ohio has resigned himto the inevitable. He has given up to get his constitutional amendment ed by this session of Congress. He that it would not get the two-thirds to in both houses necessary for such preved by this session of Congress. He mits that it would not get the two-thirds jority in both houses necessary for subscino to the states. And he is hopeful that climate will be more favorable next year. We suspect that the Bricker mendment, her in the original or revised form, he fall the original or revised form, in the line suggested by Attorney-Gengles and Brement, to specify what its already-refectly clear in the Constitution—that aims do not take precedence over either Constitution or acts of Congress—may mutally be solopied (though Bricker stout-centends that he will compromise no horizontal that the will compromise no ther). But certainly the restrictive and shereware procedure for ratifying treaties of executive agreements proposed by the ionn has been consigned to limbo, and hitly so.

Tricker was able to bambonile many seriesas, including some members of the size and a few newspaper editors, into eving that the treaty-making procedure at threat to the Constitution because he smeet his assendment at a time of near-size, when millions of Americans had thinking for themselves and had seed as truth the wild and imaginary discuss of trightened need-solitonists.

who had been made the scapegoats for past military and diplomatic mistakes. And it is continuing to change, albeit at times slowly and imperceptibly, as public confidence in President Ethenhower's Administration grows. There is no need for the amendment pre-posed by Senator Bricker. Furthermore, it would do positive harm, in that it would dangerousty handicap the President in carrying out his constitutional responsibili-ties in the foreign policy making field. The amendment is dead for the session, and should not be revived.
