Labor Movement Reaches A New Peak

DOTH in actual and potential power, Labor Day, 1955, finds organized labor standing on a new peak of achievement.

Except in scattered areas employment is high. Wages are setting new records. The principle of year-round security has been accepted by the major automobile companies, although the idea has not yet been subjected to the economic stress of less booming times.

Labor, in short, is closer than ever to being recognized as a partner with management in the vast stronghold of the secondary.
