Berlin Opera Is a Fair · Target for Englishmen

The destruction of the Berlin Opera and the damaging of various palaces in Berlin is by no means ample retailistion for the destruction of West-minster Hall, St. Martin's-in-the-Field, minster Hall, St. Martin s-in-in-relative the Coventry Cathedral, or any of hun-dreds of other British monuments, by the Nazi terror which files by night.

The Open, built by Frederick the Oreat, is in the heavy German style of the Eighteenth century, one of the most dubious ever invented by man. Architects, struggling to say nice things about it, have sometimes called it "noble" but few have ever found it beautiful.

To find monuments comparable to those which have been destroyed in England, one must turn to the provincial cities of Germany. And even there they are not numerous. Great in music, the German is almost as inept in music, the German is almost as incept at architecture as he is in politics. Berlin is in general by far the uglies great capital in the world. And it seems almost a shame to deprive it of the few buildings which give it any claim to notice at all.

to notice at all.

Nevertheless, the British work in Berlin Wednesday night was probably a step in the right direction. He own medicine seems to be the only kind the German can understand. And while the confinement of bombing to milliary objectives may be sound from the military relevable, it is obviously very poor psychology from the standpoint of the average Englishman as he see his own monuments ruthlessly destroyed.
