had locked himself in with two girls, a lot of wine and a sub-machine gun. The girls were on his cabin windows were drawn. Meanwhile, he worked with noiseless efficiency.

Large paper packages, heavily locked, were stacked about the black initials on their sides depicted the language in which the literature they contained was printed. And late at night a suspicious visitor, a man whom Water in the international drive for Communist domination of ship-

Aichkanov put his arm around my shoulder. "Comrade Walter, I recommended you for a try-out in international work," he said. "You are really doing it well. You're doing it well."

"One day on the barricade," observed Ryatt, "it worth three years of ordinary Party membership."

The instructions I received were in a book as follows: "I was to keep my berth aboard the Montpelier and return to the Pacific Coast. Before leaving, I was to keep my berth aboard the Montpelier and return to the Pacific Coast."

I was to become a member of the International Seamen's Union. I was to become a member of the International Seamen's Union. I was to become a member of the International Seamen's Union.

"I brought you a friend," he said. "He must go to Canada in safety. You must find him a place to stay."

I suspected that the newcomer was merely another illegal emigrant who passed out on Party dollars for a passage. Now I knew he was not. He was a Communist who had been in the United States for some time.

Hugo Marx flashed a quick, cold smile, and departed. The newcomer addressed me in excellent English. "I have everything in a suitcase. I was in a devil of a hurry today. My hurry as a wolf." It was to talk on deck to see his situation. I saw enough to know that this stranger had a well-built body and good features. He was of medium height, and young.

When I led him to the sailors' mess room, I saw that he was situated on the aft part of the boat deck, a still slipped out of the shadows and joined us.

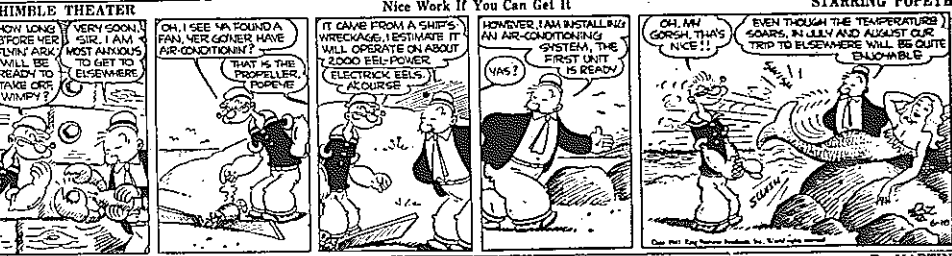

"My ship," the newcomer said. "It is going to Canada. I'd rather go to Canada. I'd rather go to Canada."

We had coffee, bread and cold beer in the mess room. I raised almost immediately that the newcomer was a Communist of exceptional ability. His name was Michel Avatin, a Lett. He was a former worker in a Communist Party in Russia. He had been in Russia, and he had worked for the Communist Party in the United States.
